RETURNS FROM INDIANA.

Burning of New York Capitol Caused a Loss of $7,000,000

HE burning of New York's capitol at Albany means a financial loss of at least $7,000,000 to the state, according to official estimates, but it means a loss in the way of historical documents and priceless relics that cannot be estimated and that is irreparable. Such things as the papers found on Major Andre when he was captured at Tarrytown, the first charter of Trinity church, New York; many confidential letters written by Seorge Washington and other documents were destroyed. Indeed, the finest collection of Americana extant was utterly ruined. The library that was burned was more than 100 years old, and it can never be duplicated. The building itself est about $25,000,000, though it was not worth one-third of that sum. Only one public building in America, the city hall at Philadelphia, was more costly, and even at that the building at Albany was not completed and never would have been finished according to the architects' plans, as the foundation was not sufficiently stable to support the huge tower designed to surmount the structure. The loss emphasizes the necessity for the better protection of valuable documents and for the realization of the fact that even contest tonight on the Gore alleys at if a building is fireproof its contents are not.
